500 CHILDREN START TO-DAY FOR COUNTRY

First to Benefit by Tribune
Fresh Air Fund Are from Guardian Society Schools.

FROM THE POOREST HOMES

Little Ones to Spend Two Weeks in the Sunshine—Mothers
Now Eager to Have Them Go Away.

Five hundred children begin their Tribune Fresh Air Fund vacations to-day. Practically the whole number have been selected from the eleven industrial schools maintained by the American Female Guardian Society in different sections of the city. The industrial school children have been given places in the first Tribune parties because the task of getting them cleaned up devolves upon the teachers, and after the schools close it is difficult for the teachers to control this matter.

The five thousand children who make up the average attendance of the industrial schools come from the poorest families in the poorest sections of the city. In a large number of cases the mother sends her child to the industrial instead of the public school because she cannot procure the clothing necessary to enable it to gain admission to the latter. Both clothes and luncheon are provided, when necessary, at the industrial school.

The principal of School No. 11, in East 16th street, in telling of the children who are to be sent away from her school said: "In many of their homes sweatshop work is carried on for starvation wages. Even the five-year-old children are found at work trying to help along the family income. In other homes the mothers go out to work by the day or tend pushcarts, which they hire by the day.

"The children of such homes have to be watched very closely to keep them in school. The moment the watch is relaxed they are kept from school and sent out to either work or do similar work."

These observations are by an eyewitness, for teachers in the industrial schools visit the homes of their pupils frequently to keep in touch with conditions there.

A teacher in the same school told this story of three children who are to be sent away from her class:

"Catherine was absent from school on visiting her I found that the mother and children had been turned out by the father, an habitual drunkard. A kindly neighbor had sheltered them. The mother is a sufferer from asthma. The children are poorly clad, look pinched and frightened. They have little to eat but tea and bread and hardly enough of this. But they will be all right now for the two weeks they are in the country."

Another story told by the same teacher had to do with the family of a man who is in the Metropolitan Hospital on Blackwell's Island—a tuberculosis patient.

"The mother works in a cigar factory and six children depend on her. The home is composed of two small rooms which are never over clean. But the little housekeeper who cares for the miserable home is only ten years old, so one can overlook some of the shortcomings. To this little mother we are trying to give a breath of fresh air. What a glorious privilege for the tired, overburdened little girl!"

The Tribune Fund has been taking five hundred of the industrial school children in its first parties for several years. The first year it was tried the mothers of the children were distrustful of the idea and in many cases refused to allow the children to be taken away. This was due to the fact that most of them were foreigners who could understand little English and to whom it was difficult to explain what was to be done. Now, these mothers have seen the results of the outings and are eager to have their children go.

Some of today's five hundred will go to the Tribune Fund's Ashford Hill Home, some to St. Helen's and others to Eunice Home.

DUKE OF SUTHERLAND DIES

Largest Landowner in Europe
Except the Czar.

London, June 26.—Cromartie Sutherland-Leveson-Gower, fourth Duke of Sutherland, died to-night.

The fourth Duke of Sutherland, who was born on July 29, 1831, son of the third duke, was, with the exception of the Emperor of Russia, the largest landowner in Europe. His Scottish estates embraced nearly a million and a half acres. He owned 20,000 acres in Staffordshire and Shropshire and much landed property in other countries.

He was Lord Lieutenant of Sutherland and president of its Territorial Force Association, honorary colonel of the Staffordshire Yeomanry, formerly a lieutenant of the 25th Life Guards, and from 1871 to 1885 was a Member of Parliament for one of the divisions of Staffordshire. He was also Mayor of London in 1885.

In 1884 he married Lady Millicent Fanny St. Clair-Erskine, daughter of the fourth Earl of Rosslyn. Two sons and one daughter survive him. His eldest son, hitherto known as the Marquis of Stafford, a lieutenant in the Royal Scots Greys, succeeds to the title. He was born in 1883.

The duke paid several visits to America, having landed interests in North-western Canada, Alberta and Saskatchewan, and on the occasion of his last visit here, in 1912, he was accompanied by the duchess, Lady Rosemary Leveson-Gower, his daughter, and Lord Alastair, his second son. The duke was here earlier in the year, and in May was the guest of the New York Yacht Club, to which he presented, in behalf of the Royal Yacht Squadron, the golden eagle that had adorned the stern of the yacht America, that won the challenge cup at Cowes in 1851—the cup which has remained in this country ever since. While on that visit he was the guest of Colonel Robert M. Thompson.

Several years ago the duke made an attempt to interest American capitalists in a scheme to colonize Western Canada with English and American settlers. It was his belief that for business and defence the English speaking peoples should get together. He was sure that America did not wish to rule Canada. He was instrumental in securing a charter which was granted for the British Canadian Land Settlement Corporation, Limited, with a capital of $2,000,000. Besides his colonization plan he had large private farming interests in Canada. He felt that his colonization scheme should be favorably received in America because the interests of Canada and the United States were so closely allied.

In Canada, however, the duke did not receive so royal a welcome. His plan was looked upon by some of the newspapers there as landlordism such as prevails in the British Isles.

In Great Britain the Duke of Sutherland was a prime mover to bring about the best of feeling between the British and Americans. It was at his London home, Stafford House, that the inaugural meeting of the Anglo-American League was held.

Stafford House is one of the finest in England and in it there is a splendid collection of paintings. Some of the duke's notable collection was sold when he closed Trenton in 1898, but many portraits by the old English masters were retained, and there are more than three hundred pictures by painters of repute still in the collection. It was said a few months ago that negotiations were in progress for the sale at auction of at least a part of this collection. Stafford House was built for the second son of George III and for many years the most elaborate entertainments were given there. In the last few years the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland have not entertained as lavishly as was once their wont.

The Duke of Sutherland assumed the title upon the death of his father in 1892. The family name is Sutherland-Leveson-Gower. The dukedom was created in 1832. The Scottish earldom of Sutherland is said to have existed since 1067, but William, styled the first earl, received the title about 1230 for his services in suppressing an insurrection.

The late duke was noted as a sportsman and was a prominent yachtsman. His yachts included the Catania and the Lizzette.

WALTER W. BURRIDGE.

Walter W. Burridge, the scenic artist, who died on Tuesday at Albuquerque, N. M., from heart disease, was born in Brooklyn fifty-six years ago. He first came into prominence in his youth as a scene painter in the churches of St. Ann's Church, the Church of the Redeemer and St. John's Church, in Brooklyn. His father, Henry Burridge, was proprietor of the old Marston Arms Inn, on Myrtle avenue, much frequented in those days by artists and actors, with whom he became well acquainted.

His first art productions were in the studio of Harley Merry, in Brooklyn, to whom he was apprenticed at the age of thirteen years. He painted the "Siege of Paris," which was exhibited at the Philadelphia Centennial, and later he produced "The Battle of Gettysburg." Under a commission from the government he visited Hawaii, where he painted a cyclonic picture of the volcano Kalauea, which formed part of the government exhibit at the World's Fair.

SCHIFF DEFENDS JAPAN

Sentiment Here for Citizenship, Says Banker.

Mr. Schiff said the movement to refuse citizenship to Japanese who have permanent residences in the United States was unpopular in some other places as well as in Japan.

"It is just as unpopular among the majority of the best citizens of our own country," he said. "But I have too much confidence in the good sense and discretion of the Japanese people to apprehend any serious consequences from this unpleasantness."

"I have had business relations with Japanese people in which many hundreds of thousands of dollars were involved, and never have I had the least cause to doubt their honesty or fair-mindedness."

Among those at the luncheon besides Mr. Schiff were Lindsay Russell, president of the Japan Society; Dr. Hamilton Wright Mabie, who presided; Dr. David Starr Jordan, formerly president of Lehigh University; Jerome D. Greene, Melville E. Stone, Lawrence P. Abbott, S. Kurnau, acting Consul General of Japan; Willard D. Straight, Isaac N. Seligman, John Franklin Fort, ex-Governor of New Jersey, and Dr. George F. Kinn.

"Japan looks up to your country," said Dr. Soyeda, "and follows in the footsteps of the United States in everything she undertakes."

He described himself as one of a commission of four sent by the Associated Chambers of Commerce of Japan to study the California situation. After visiting that state the commission went to Washington, where its members were received by President Wilson and Secretary Bryan.

Dr. Mabie said Perry had awakened Japan, and now it is the duty of this country to aid the people of the Far East in their upward march.

Dr. Jordan spoke of Japan as the only foreign country in the world where the people really love the United States. He likened the people of Japan to a country boy who has just come to the city. He sees and is interested in many things, whose uses and purposes he does not understand.

R. Ichimura, manager of the New York branch of the Yokohama Specie Bank, spoke in behalf of the fifteen hundred Japanese residents of this city.

"The strong support you have given to the course pursued by the President of the United States," he said, "has deeply impressed us with the love of justice and high sense of patriotism by which you are actuated. We are inspired with the hope that the present unfortunate dispute will soon be a thing of the past, and will prove to have been a cyclone on a corner of the vast Pacific."
